First of all, the first step before cooking rice is to wash the rice grains.

This is a very critical step. Don't use excessive force during washing, and it should not take too long. Otherwise, it will easily cause the loss of nutrients in the rice grains. Generally, the rice grains are washed twice. A more critical little detail is to soak the rice grains in clean water for a short while.

The purpose of soaking is to allow each grain of rice to absorb a certain amount of water, so that the rice will be fuller and taste better. Of course, the effect of soaking with warm water will be better.

Secondly, when the soaked rice grains are put into the pot for steaming.

Some white vinegar and sesame oil can be appropriately added to make the cooked rice look more clear and increase appetite. In addition, white vinegar also has the effect of promoting fragrance. It can increase the fragrance of rice, but the amount should not be too much, or it will be counterproductive.

Finally, after many people have cooked the rice, they often put it directly into a bowl and then eat it directly. But they don't know that this kind of rice tastes a bit bad. In fact, the freshly cooked rice has uneven softness and moisture, because the upper layer and the rice grains in contact with the pot body will be heated more and the taste will be better.

The rice in the middle layer is less heated and tends to be moist and soft, and has a poor taste. When it is served, the rice should be turned slightly to make the whole pot of rice soft and humid, and then the rice will be simmered for a few minutes before serving. Eat, the taste is moderate and firm, full of strength.
